
such a product. Selective absorption of the active component of the drug Rizatriptan by the hair. The prodrug Rizatriptan is administered orally and reached its absorption site on the scalp after passing through the gastrointestinal tract. The absorption of Rizatriptan from the gastrointestinal tract was determined by mass balance studies with a crossover design. Rizatriptan was administered orally to a group of 12 healthy volunteers at the dose of 1 mg. The amount absorbed was calculated by difference, the remaining amount of drug in the systemic circulation compared to the amount administered. The low variability, in terms of the absorptions obtained (range 28-49%) and the agreement of the calculated and measured values, demonstrated that the hair plays a role in the absorption of Rizatriptan from the gastrointestinal tract. In addition, the study revealed that the hair filaments are better absorbers of Rizatriptan compared to a more distal hair follicle. The oral administration of Rizatriptan at the recommended therapeutic doses provided an absorption rate of Rizatriptan from the gastrointestinal tract of 2.3%, well below the 5% required to maximize the therapeutic effect.
